A modified flow-injection multichannel technique is described for the determination of the transfer constant of the benzidine-N-acetylcysteine reaction for quantitative determination of N-acetylcysteine in biological fluids. Our approach compares well with the well-known HPLC methods of total cysteine determination and permits the determination of cysteine and of the biotransformed amino acid or metabolite. Thoracic brachial plexus nerve injuries: surgical technique and results in 75 patients. A retrospective review of 75 patients with 78 thoracic brachial plexus nerve injuries treated from 1977 to 1989 was performed to evaluate outcome. Seventy-eight (80%) of the patients were treated surgically, and the remaining 12 (16%) were treated nonoperatively. In the surgical group, 1 patient had an isolated brachial plexopathy; 65 patients (83%) had root avulsion injuries, and 10 had neurotmesis without root avulsion injury. Postoperative improvement was achieved in 67 (94%) patients; this included 21 (54%) with complete and 36 (94%) with incomplete root avulsions, and in eight (73%) patients with neurotmesis. With medical followup for at least 12 months (mean, 42 months), 55 (80%) of the surgically treated patients had at least 50% improvement of their hand and/or arm function. Complications included four infections, three nerve transfers, and two endarteritis. A multidimensional approach to brachial plexus injury based on anatomic and functional relationships is imperative for successful neurosurgical
